

Chapter Three

I have nothing to teach anyone. In any case, the pain and despair experienced by my characters hardly invite imitation, though conversely, there is no tragic denouement which reinforces the existing moral consensus. Rather the plays remove, plank by plank, the floor of existing moral opinion in order to plead other, unarticulated causes.

(Howard Barker, Arguments for a Theatre, p. 82)